Mia Kang
Admitted: Harvard, NYU (scholarship), Berkeley

Congratulations, your search for a tutor is over. Jon is absolutely superb and I can't emphasize enough how tutoring with him has been the best investment I've made on the path to law school. I was nervous about our sessions being over Skype before the first session but now I can assure you that his methods of screen-sharing not only allowed for very efficient sessions, but had me engaged every minute. He was incredibly flexible to my schedule, and the only problems we ever had with sound or connection were on my end.

You have but to speak with him to see how extensive his knowledge of the LSAT is, but what truly sets Jon apart as a tutor is his ability to break down any facet of the test – from big picture concepts to individual questions – both verbally and visually in multiple ways that are all thorough, clear, and easy to understand (Bonus: a lot of them are quite funny). I went into the test with my intuition, but Jon helped me transform vague intuition into the concrete nuts and bolts behind arguments, logical reasoning, and games. He has a unique outlook on the LSAT that laid the foundation for how I thinking about and approaching the test that helped me to understand the structure behind the concepts in the test, and therefore what kinds of patterns I could expect to see. While it seems subtle, understanding this point was what got me to consistently scoring in the 175 range in my practice tests. Jon was also critical in that, because he constantly tailored my study schedule to address any of my dynamic needs, worries, goals and weaknesses.

One of my favorite things about Jon is that his genuine love for teaching shines through in his work. It makes him truly a pleasure to work with. He was always available for questions regarding any facet of the LSAT and applying for law school, and is way more detailed and informative than everything you will be able find online. Trust me, I've scoured the internet and his advice is golden. He's also hilarious, and really easygoing and has gone beyond the call of duty in listening to all of my stressed concerns and putting my law school anguish at ease. Today, I received my acceptance into Harvard Law School and I really can't thank Jon enough for being there through the entire journey.

In sum, I've come to the conclusion that Jon knows anything and everything regarding the LSAT and any topic remotely related to it. And not only was I lucky enough to meet the best tutor I could have possibly asked for, I've also made a wonderful friend and know more about the LSAT than I previously imagined I would.